A Mega Tsunami May Devastate Eastern US Coastline

It may happy any time soon, but the Cumber Viega (old summit) volcano in the Canary Islands is bound to erupt again again and when it does, it may well set in motion a tsunami more massive in recorded history. According to a new model by Simon Day of University college, London and Steven Ward of the University of California, this mege tsunami, which they describe in the September 2001 issue of Geographical Research letters. Would rouse waves 100 meters high the west Saharan shore, seas more than 40 meters on the north coast of Brazil, and water towering 50 meters in the air on the coast of Florida. Britain; Spain, Portugal and France would also face sizeable waves.

Cumber Viega's collaps would send up a dome of water 900 meters higt and tens of kilometers wide. As that dome collapses and rebounds, giant waves would form and in 10 minutes, such a tsunami would travel almost 250 kilometers!
