Subject One:

Part one: Reading and interpreting (08pts)

A- Comprehension: Read the text below and answer the following questions:

Corruption in education is particularly damaging because it endangers a country's social, economic and political future. It is more detrimental than corruption in other sectors because of its long-term effects. Corruption threatens equal access, quantity and quality of education. Its consequences are particularly harsh for the poor who, without access to education or with no alternative but low-quality education, have little chance to escape life of poverty. Corruption is incompatible with one of the major aims of education: producing citizens that respect the law and human rights. If children come to believe that personal effort and merit do not count and that success comes through manipulation, favouritism and bribery, then the very foundations of society are shaken.

Corruption in education can take many forms: bribes paid by parents to teachers to ensure good grades and examination results for their children; bribes paid by teachers to public officials to get preferred posting and promotion; embezzlement of funds allocated to purchase teaching materials or to build schools. Corruption in the education sector can also mean the bypassing of criteria in the approval of school establishment and accreditation, and nepotism in teacher appointment, resulting in "ghost teachers" or the selling of information on exams.

Curbing corruption in education requires a similar approach to tackling corruption in other social sectors. Governments should work to increase accountability in educational systems. Besides, clear sanctions for bribery must coexist with codes of conduct. Another key determinant for successfully battling corruption in education is access to information, for example on resources allocated to schools, and effective complaint mechanisms for students and parents. Finally, civil society should be involved in educational planning and school management as well.
