Text:

Beethoven, one of the greatest composers and whose music is played all over the world, was deaf. It's difficult to believe that he couldn't hear for most of his life as a composer.

Beethoven was only 26 when he started to become deaf. When he was 30, he had noises in his ears. He had to play his piano very loudly to hear the music. Over the next few years, he quickly became deafer and deafer. At first, he could use an ear trumpet to help him hear, but soon he made no difference. Finally, he had to use "conversation books" to communicate with people by writing. He was able to write a personal diary of how being deaf made him sad and lonely.

But Beethoven was also a very cheerful person who was able to conduct the first performance of his "ninth symphony" in 1824. He couldn't hear when the orchestra stopped playing at the end and he couldn't hear the audience's applause.
